It is used as a research tool for the creation of large-scale machine translation systems (MT systems). The first automated MT system was developed in 1965 by James Mercer. In the 1990s, the technology began to be used in commercial applications. In 2005, a system was used to translate the first Google product's English text into 16 languages. For example, the commercial MT systems used by Google and Microsoft each translate several hundreds of thousands of documents per day. As of 2006, most commercial MT systems are based on systems developed at the University of California, Berkeley. Moreover, new techniques and tools have been invented to improve the accuracy of the machine translation output. History In the 1950s, the term MT was used to indicate automatic translation of textual content between two (or more) languages. The first text of machine translation (MT) was the manual translation of the Italian play Stato di diritto, which in the 16th century was translated from Latin into Italian. At the same time, the Italian developer of the first MT system, James Mercer, developed the first MT system called TXT-Turing. This system was conceived in the 1950s and was completed in 1965. The first MT systems were used in the mid-1960s to assist language learners, and also as computer-assisted language learning tools. The first commercial MT technology (that is, not specifically for language learning) was developed by IBM, who, as one of their first commercial applications of the technology, used it for their mainframe product IBM Translator for the US Defense Department. By the 1970s, machine translation had become used in professional communication, and also as a research tool for the creation of large-scale MT systems. By 2005, a system was used to translate the first Google product's English text into 16 languages. Machine translation (MT) software was introduced in 1965 by James Mercer for his computer program called 'TXT-Turing.' In 1965, the concept of MT was first conceptualized by James Mercer in his doctoral dissertation at Berkeley. However, his dissertation idea was in the pre-Internet age, hence it did not progress further. According to Mercer, the first natural language processing system was 09e8f5149f
